Importance of Aligning Sales and Marketing

Marketing departments, it can be argued, remain some of the least disciplined in many organizations. In order to better achieve specific marketing objectives they must first be understood across the board so that internet marketing and other campaigns can be built to achieve them. Sales and marketing departments need to come to agreement on defining a quality lead in order to later gain quality leads. Influential customers, highest potential prospects, and other key customer groupings need to be segmented and prioritized so that they can be effectively targeted.

How to Increase ROI

“Anyone having a hard time justifying their marketing budget requests with their CFO, or feeling the heat from their VP of Sales regarding the quality of leads, should attend the Execution for ROI: Aligning the Sales/Marketing Planets session at Online Marketing: Innovations that Work,” says James.

In this session, James will discuss with attendees how to achieve these objectives and measure the impact of marketing investments across various communication channels including TV, radio, direct mail, and internet marketing. Measuring these investments should include a variety of factors beyond revenue such as brand, relationship, and customer loyalty. Each of these areas can be measurable when cross department communication is effective.
